Course Description: The numerous oral mucosal diseases can be difficult to identify for even experienced clinicians. This three-part session is designed to aid providers in the diagnosis and management of oral pathology with an emphasis on formulating differential diagnoses based on coloration. Red lesions, white lesions, and variously-colored pigmented lesions will be discussed with a focus on distinguishing benign from malignant pathology and on approaches to treatment.

Learning Objectives: In this three-hour lecture, the participant will learn:

- To describe the etiology of various inflammatory, infectious, and neoplastic oral diseases
- To recognize clinical presentations for oral pathologic conditions presenting as red, white, or pigmented lesions
- To formulate a differential for oral mucosal lesions based on coloration
- To execute appropriate management strategies for oral mucosal lesions

About the Speaker:

Mark Lerman earned his D.M.D. from Tufts University and completed a general practice residency in dentistry at Brigham and Women's Hospital. After undergoing his oral pathology training at New York Hospital Medical Center of Queens, he was on the fulltime faculty at the Harvard School of Dental Medicine for eight years.

He currently serves at the Division Director of Oral Pathology and an associate professor at the Tufts University School of Dental Medicine. He divides his time there between teaching, clinical practice, and an active biopsy service. He also holds an adjunct faculty appointment at MCPHS University's Forsyth School for Dental Hygiene, where he has served as course director for Oral Pathology since 2012.
